- A person's financial condition can vary significantly based on their income level. At the most stable level, earnings are sufficient to meet all basic needs with some room for discretionary spending, allowing for a balanced lifestyle. However, in a more fragile condition, while basic necessities may be covered, the individual's financial stability remains vulnerable to unexpected expenses or changes in income. In a secure condition, earnings not only exceed basic needs but also provide the means for regular savings, investments, and long-term financial security, offering peace of mind and the ability to plan for the future.
